TITLES.

Who would not often in dim hours of life,
Steal from our world a space
To recreate a dream, regain the sun
In some sweet alien place,

Some land we never knew or had forgot,
Where shadows only fall
To make more subtly fair the aureate light,
Which threads their tranquill pall.

Where trails slant valley-wise and eager feet
Impatient feel their way.

Companioned by those tantalizing elves,
Sunsprite and shadow-fay.

Far on before, from its cool rock home,
A waterfall descends.

Deep in its foamy veil,
The sunsprite hides,
The Shadow Fairy bends.

And something of their rollicking it keeps
Down all its dancing track.

Till canyons claim its laughter, and its song
Floats only faintly back.

Yet but a breath space and the chasms set
Their sparkling captive free.

A thing of joyous riot, jewel-strung,
It tumbles toward the sea,

And here a high trail glistens, where a peak
Snow-crowned and cloud enfurled

Beckons us skyward through a dazzling rack,
To perch atop the world.

Till where its snow lies patterned by the sun,
Though untaming shadows, crowd---

We may fling out our cares in nether space,
And cry our joy aloud.

Sometimes a frosty finger stays the flight of the glad torrent's rush

And strives to bind it with a silver seal
In an enchanted hush.

Still with this final beauty near the soul,
We take the homeward way,

And something that was lacking ere we climbed,
May glorify the day.

If turning back to turmoil, we remember
How sunbeams are to shade,

Then we shall muster hosts of golden hours
And labor unafraid.
